

Prologue: Ghosts of Black Bear Mountain Midwood

The wind howled through the trees, carrying with it the scent of pine needles and damp earth. The rain beat against the windows of the old house, creating a mournful symphony that echoed through the empty rooms.

Inside, a young woman sat by the fireplace, her eyes fixed on the flickering flames. She was alone, save for the company of the ghosts that haunted the house.

The ghosts were not malevolent, but they were restless. They had been trapped in the house for centuries, unable to move on to the afterlife. They whispered to the young woman, telling her their stories of love, loss, and betrayal.

The young woman listened to the ghosts' stories, and she felt their pain. She knew that she had to help them find peace.

One night, the young woman gathered the ghosts together in the living room. She lit a candle for each of them, and she began to sing. Her voice was soft and sweet, and it filled the room with a sense of peace.

As she sang, the ghosts began to glow. Their forms became more and more transparent, until they were nothing but wisps of smoke. And then, one by one, they disappeared.

The young woman watched as the ghosts disappeared, and she felt a sense of sadness. But she also felt a sense of peace. She knew that the ghosts had finally found their way to the afterlife.

The next morning, the young woman woke up with a start. She had had a dream. In her dream, she saw the ghosts of Black Bear Mountain Midwood. They were happy and at peace. They thanked her for helping them find their way to the afterlife.

The young woman knew that her dream was a sign. She had been chosen to help the ghosts of Black Bear Mountain Midwood find peace. And she knew that she would not rest until she had helped them all.
