Elyse Rycroft and Lori Lightfoot are two friends who share a love of adventure and the outdoors. They have always dreamed of traveling to the Arctic, and in 2015, they decided to make their dream a reality. They packed up their belongings, said goodbye to their families and friends, and set off on their journey.

The women traveled by ski, dogsled, and kayak, covering two thousand miles of unforgiving terrain. They faced blizzards, whiteouts, and subzero temperatures. They had to contend with hungry polar bears, and they had to find food and shelter in a remote and unforgiving environment.

But despite the challenges, the women never gave up. They relied on each other for support, and they found strength in their love for their dog, Nuna. Nuna was a constant companion, and she provided the women with much-needed love and affection.

The women's journey was not without its setbacks. They faced physical and emotional challenges, and they lost loved ones along the way. But they also found hope and healing in the Arctic wilderness. They learned the importance of resilience, and they discovered the power of friendship.

Two Women, One Dog, Two Thousand Miles to the Arctic is an inspiring and heartwarming story of adventure, love, loss, and resilience. It is a must-read for anyone who loves adventure, dogs, or stories of overcoming adversity.
